This is not a sequence of poems. Each one of the seventy-eight poems in this collection (corresponding to the seventy eight cards in the Tarot Pack) is quite different from all the others, as unique and original as the card to which it refers. For example:

III of Swords

The rain falls ...
The heart is pierced
not once
but again
and again ...
And still the rain falls.
Only rain
can make the flowers grow
and bloom
and blow in the wind
and sunshine.

Only a pierced heart
can know
what it is to love.

What are you telling me, little fish,
that someone gave as a present to me?
Throw me back and I'll be with you whenever you sail upon the sea.

Foolish promises, little fish.
Nobody stands with his back to the sea
save those who drowned in a former life,
those who fear and abhor the sea.

Would you really do this thing for me?
Would you, could you, little fish.
Throw me back and my sisters three will come to you wherever you be,

when your ship falls apart and the sailors drown,
and carry you safe through the raging sea.

X of Pentacles

An old man
sitting in the shade by the Great Gate reflecting on the Tree of Life.
His wife is dead. These dogs?

He hardly knows them. Though he knew their great-great-(great-great-?) grandsire, remembers him even as a pup.
And those two standing there?
That's not his daughter. (His daughter, too,
is dead.) That's his granddaughter.
And his great grandson.
The Tree of Life. The ten Sefiroth. What goes up must come down, they say.
And so it must. But more importantly,
what comes down must one day go back up. One day soon.

VII of Wands

Fending off
sticks and stones
and spears
is child's-play.

Brushing off
your neighbours' jeers,
the sneers of work-place rivals,
your own self-doubt and fears
is not.

Yet children do it
every day.

That's one example from each of the suits of the Minor Arcana. As you can imagine, many of the best poems relate to the Major Arcana – but for those you'll have to buy the book. (Even a poet must eat!)
