Sample passage:

The Society of Friends, or Quakers, had divided on the slavery question and, as this sect had always recognized equality of rights, their women especially resented the discriminations that were being made. In 1848 during the yearly meeting of the liberal branch in Waterloo, New York, Elizabeth Cady Stanton went over from her home in the neighboring village of Seneca Falls to be with Lucretia Mott at the home of a mutual friend, Mary Ann McClintock. Mrs. Mott's sister, Martha C. Wright, came from Auburn. The four women talked over the situation and Mrs. Mott and Mrs. Stanton decided to put into effect the resolution they had made in London eight years before to call a convention for a public discussion of the rights of women. So here in the McClintock home on a Sunday morning in June these four issued a "Call" for the first woman's rights convention in all history and published it, unsigned, in a local paper. They then prepared a declaration of rights modeled after the Declaration of Independence and a set of resolutions that demanded practically every right that women are enjoying at the present day, including suffrage. The convention met in Seneca Falls, July 19–20, in the Wesleyan Methodist Church, and James

Mott, of Philadelphia, the husband of Lucretia, and one of the most prominent Friends in the country, presided. As many as the church would hold were present; the declaration and resolutions were discussed and adopted, and here began the movement for woman suffrage, which then continued without cessation.
